ChatGPT:

Why is Sweden moving towards a more free market healthcare system?

Sweden is not abandoning universal, tax-funded health care, but it has been incorporating more market mechanisms— private providers, patient choice, competition, and payment following the patient. And the main reason is fairly practical: Sweden has struggled with waiting times, access, continuity of care, and efficiency despite spending heavily on health care. (OBS)

A few things are driving the shift:

- Long waits. Sweden produces generally good health outcomes, but waiting times for non-emergency treatment and difficulty getting timely access to primary care have been persistent weaknesses. The current government explicitly lists reducing queues, increasing availability and improving efficiency among its health-care priorities.
